ARTIST STATEMENT

Combining my experience as an architect and an artist, I strive to work with space and fragile, ephemeral artistic materials. I create installations from polyethylene, paper, tennis nets, and papier-mâché. The plasticity and fragility of forms are connected to the category of the temporal, which is important to me. I am inspired by nomadic dwellings, spontaneous architecture, and infrastructure. Recently, I began working with archives, specifically the destruction of personal archives. In tune with the widespread destruction of cultural archives and the rewriting of history in Russia, I create blank sheets from valuable papers. Sometimes in my works, I use performative mediums and textual, graphic, and collage images. Form can be, well, almost anything. But it is extremely important to me. Quality and immersion in the material are tantamount to meaning for me.

This multidisciplinary project explores human interaction with nature and non-human species. It simulates new situations of spectator involvement. Utopian public architecture is contained within three towers. The Insecto-Phalanstery is a remarkable nomadic chariot for bees. The Bird Bell Tower, built around a birch tree, and the Theater of Nature is a ten-meter cascade of balconies for plants.

Each of these towers reframes the relationship between different biological species and humans through a set of rituals, namely, the practice of care, gift-giving, and shared meals. Sound art contributes to this experience.

Druzhba, together with the participants of the second season of the Young Adults project and specialists of the Dragonproject educational club, investigated how people who came to HES-2 for the first time feel. As a result of the survey, it turned out that sometimes visitors feel cold and uncomfortable and are looking for a place where they can sit with a small group, play or talk quietly. Young adults decided to create such a place. The survey revealed that sometimes visitors feel cold and uncomfortable and are looking for a place where they can sit with a small group, play or talk quietly. Such a place was created on the territory of the HPP-2 cluster.

The interactive art object "Volga Elephant" took up residence on the beach of the Volga River for the duration of the festival. The project is inspired by the story "The Little Prince" and reminds us that only the heart is vigilant. Visitors are invited to pass through zones of gravity, sympathy, smoothing corners, intimacy; along the way they encounter spaces for interaction and communication. The amphitheater, portal, sound and tactile elements became part of a long "snake stretching from the water's edge across the sand." The Volga elephant looks at the snake and says: "This is not a hat"... And what will you see?

The Labyrinth Forest represents different types of animal shelters. While wandering along the "corridors" of the Forest, you can come across a Beehive, a Hollow and a Nest. The Big Nest is the central object of the pavilion. It brings together all visitors, both adults and children. In general, each of these components of the pavilion is aimed at joint play between an adult and a child. The Hollow has peep windows from the "trunk" of the tree to the outside. Small for children, but larger, or rather higher, for adults. A hive is an outwardly potbellied object with an unexpectedly structured internal structure. The Forest itself - scaffolding and a chaotic shell of old boards - is thick and explosive towards the embankment. It gradually thins out towards the water.

SNOW MAIDEN. EPILOGUE

This multidisciplinary experience explores human nature and non-human nature. It simulates a nomadic life for the spectator involved in a Utopian public space contained within three towers. The Insecto-Phalanstery is a remarkable nomadic chariot for bees. The Bird Bell Tower, built around a birch tree, and the Theater of Nature is a ten-meter cascade of balconies for plants. Each of these towers reframes the relationship between different biological species and humans through a set of rituals, namely, the practice of care, gift-giving, and shared meals. ЭПИЛОГ

This rejection isn't displayed out of boredom or for show, and it's not the contradictions of desire that torment bodies, tear nights apart, or confuse reasoning.
Kristeva Yu.
Forces of Horror: An Essay on Disgust.

A knot of thin threads piercing the body has gathered between the ribs. It knots, pulls, cuts. It radiates to the head, to the metal insert at the back. Breathing through a dirty filter. The stomach and veins swell, not reaching the lungs. Then the sigh gets stuck. Exhale, a long exhale. The disappearing body, dry, emaciated, quickly swells, becomes liquid, the muscles atrophy, there is nothing below the belly, beyond the pain there is already emptiness. Scratching, tearing with nails at the rotting hole in the place burning with pain. To spread the ribs, so I want to spread them and reach out, to tear this knot. Through my jaw, I want to pull out my teeth to scratch the aching bone through my gums. I want to rip the spaces between my teeth with a thread, knock them out. Anything to avoid looking at them in the mirror, to avoid looking into their eyes. There I am, lost as if I were my own, there are so many gazes. They/we are peeping. Watch how I stick my fingers in my mouth, lick my remaining teeth, bite the peeling shreds of my nails. Swallow the torn pieces of gums. Greenish liquid continues to trickle onto my dry lips, covered in bits of dried mucus.

I slide onto the bathroom floor. The cold, broken tiles, covered in dust, urine, and dirt, creak, dry particles pressing against each other, digging in and roughly cutting through the hard layers of dead skin. Something living reacts with rejection. The fragments, penetrating further into the soft, flabby fibers, smell the stale smell of decay and rot. Through the murky void, one can still faintly taste the iron in the blood and the dirty, damp dust.

The swollen belly is riddled with tubes of liquid mass, thickened and hardened by tension and fatigue. Descending and intertwining from the inside out, entangling the ovaries and exiting the vagina, they burst, taking chunks of flesh with them. Sticking fingers inside, they reach for the remains in the belly and rip them out with a wet squelch, causing a scream, convulsions. Blink and see reflections in the fragments, it seemed. Clean skin, no blood, no tubes. A sudden relaxation, wet fingers touching themselves, blood pulsing, muscles.

A spasm in the throat from touching the object. The contact of dangerous substances, inside and outside a spongy organism. Panic and a wave of nausea. A sweaty body, coated in hair and invisible dirt. Digital film, new modifications, the removal of fear, as if by instructions, fear eats away at the soul. The numbness of an absent body. Disgust at waste. Manifestation and vomiting. I push myself out, spit myself out, lose myself. Balancing on the edge of my living state, I become different at the cost of my own death.

The sharp intrusion of a foreign body into the sphincter, an object into the vulva. Pain with straining, movement. Adaptation to the pain. A burning bladder. A wet tampon, covered in white liquid and feces, slips onto the sand. It is pushed out, discarded. Nearby, the clinging of tiny grains of sand, the clinging and creaking of glass. And then, slippery tiles. Where? And who?
